Question Part

Buddhist environmental ethics help in the protection of forests and nature. You may only take what you need. You may not take it for financial benefit. This creates a balance in the ecosystem and a link between Buddhist and nature.

Question Part

To create a stable ecosystem Buddhists only take what they need for example it is ok to cut down a tree for your own need. But you cannot cut down hundreds of trees for a financial benefit.

This is also linked to a Buddhists diet, how they cannot eat past a certain time. Their body ~~do~~ does not need the food so it would only be used for self gratification.

Question Part

Temple Puja is significant in the lives of adherents because it creates rituals and wholeness. Adherents use symbolic rituals to show their respect to the Buddha. Before they enter the temple they clean themselves and take off their shoes, this shows their purity. They bowl three times, touching their mouth, chest and head which symbolises right speech, right thought and right actions.

The Adherents do these rituals to show their commitment to the Buddha. These rituals also create a sense of equality between the adherents as they all do the same things.
